

A close-up photograph of a heart-shaped rock resting on a beach. The rock is light-colored with some darker, brownish staining on its right side. It is surrounded by numerous other smooth, rounded stones of various sizes and colors, including shades of brown, tan, and grey. The background is a dense field of these pebbles, creating a textured and natural setting.

The God We Worship

Do you cringe, roll your eyes, or sigh when you discover someone has a differing opinion?

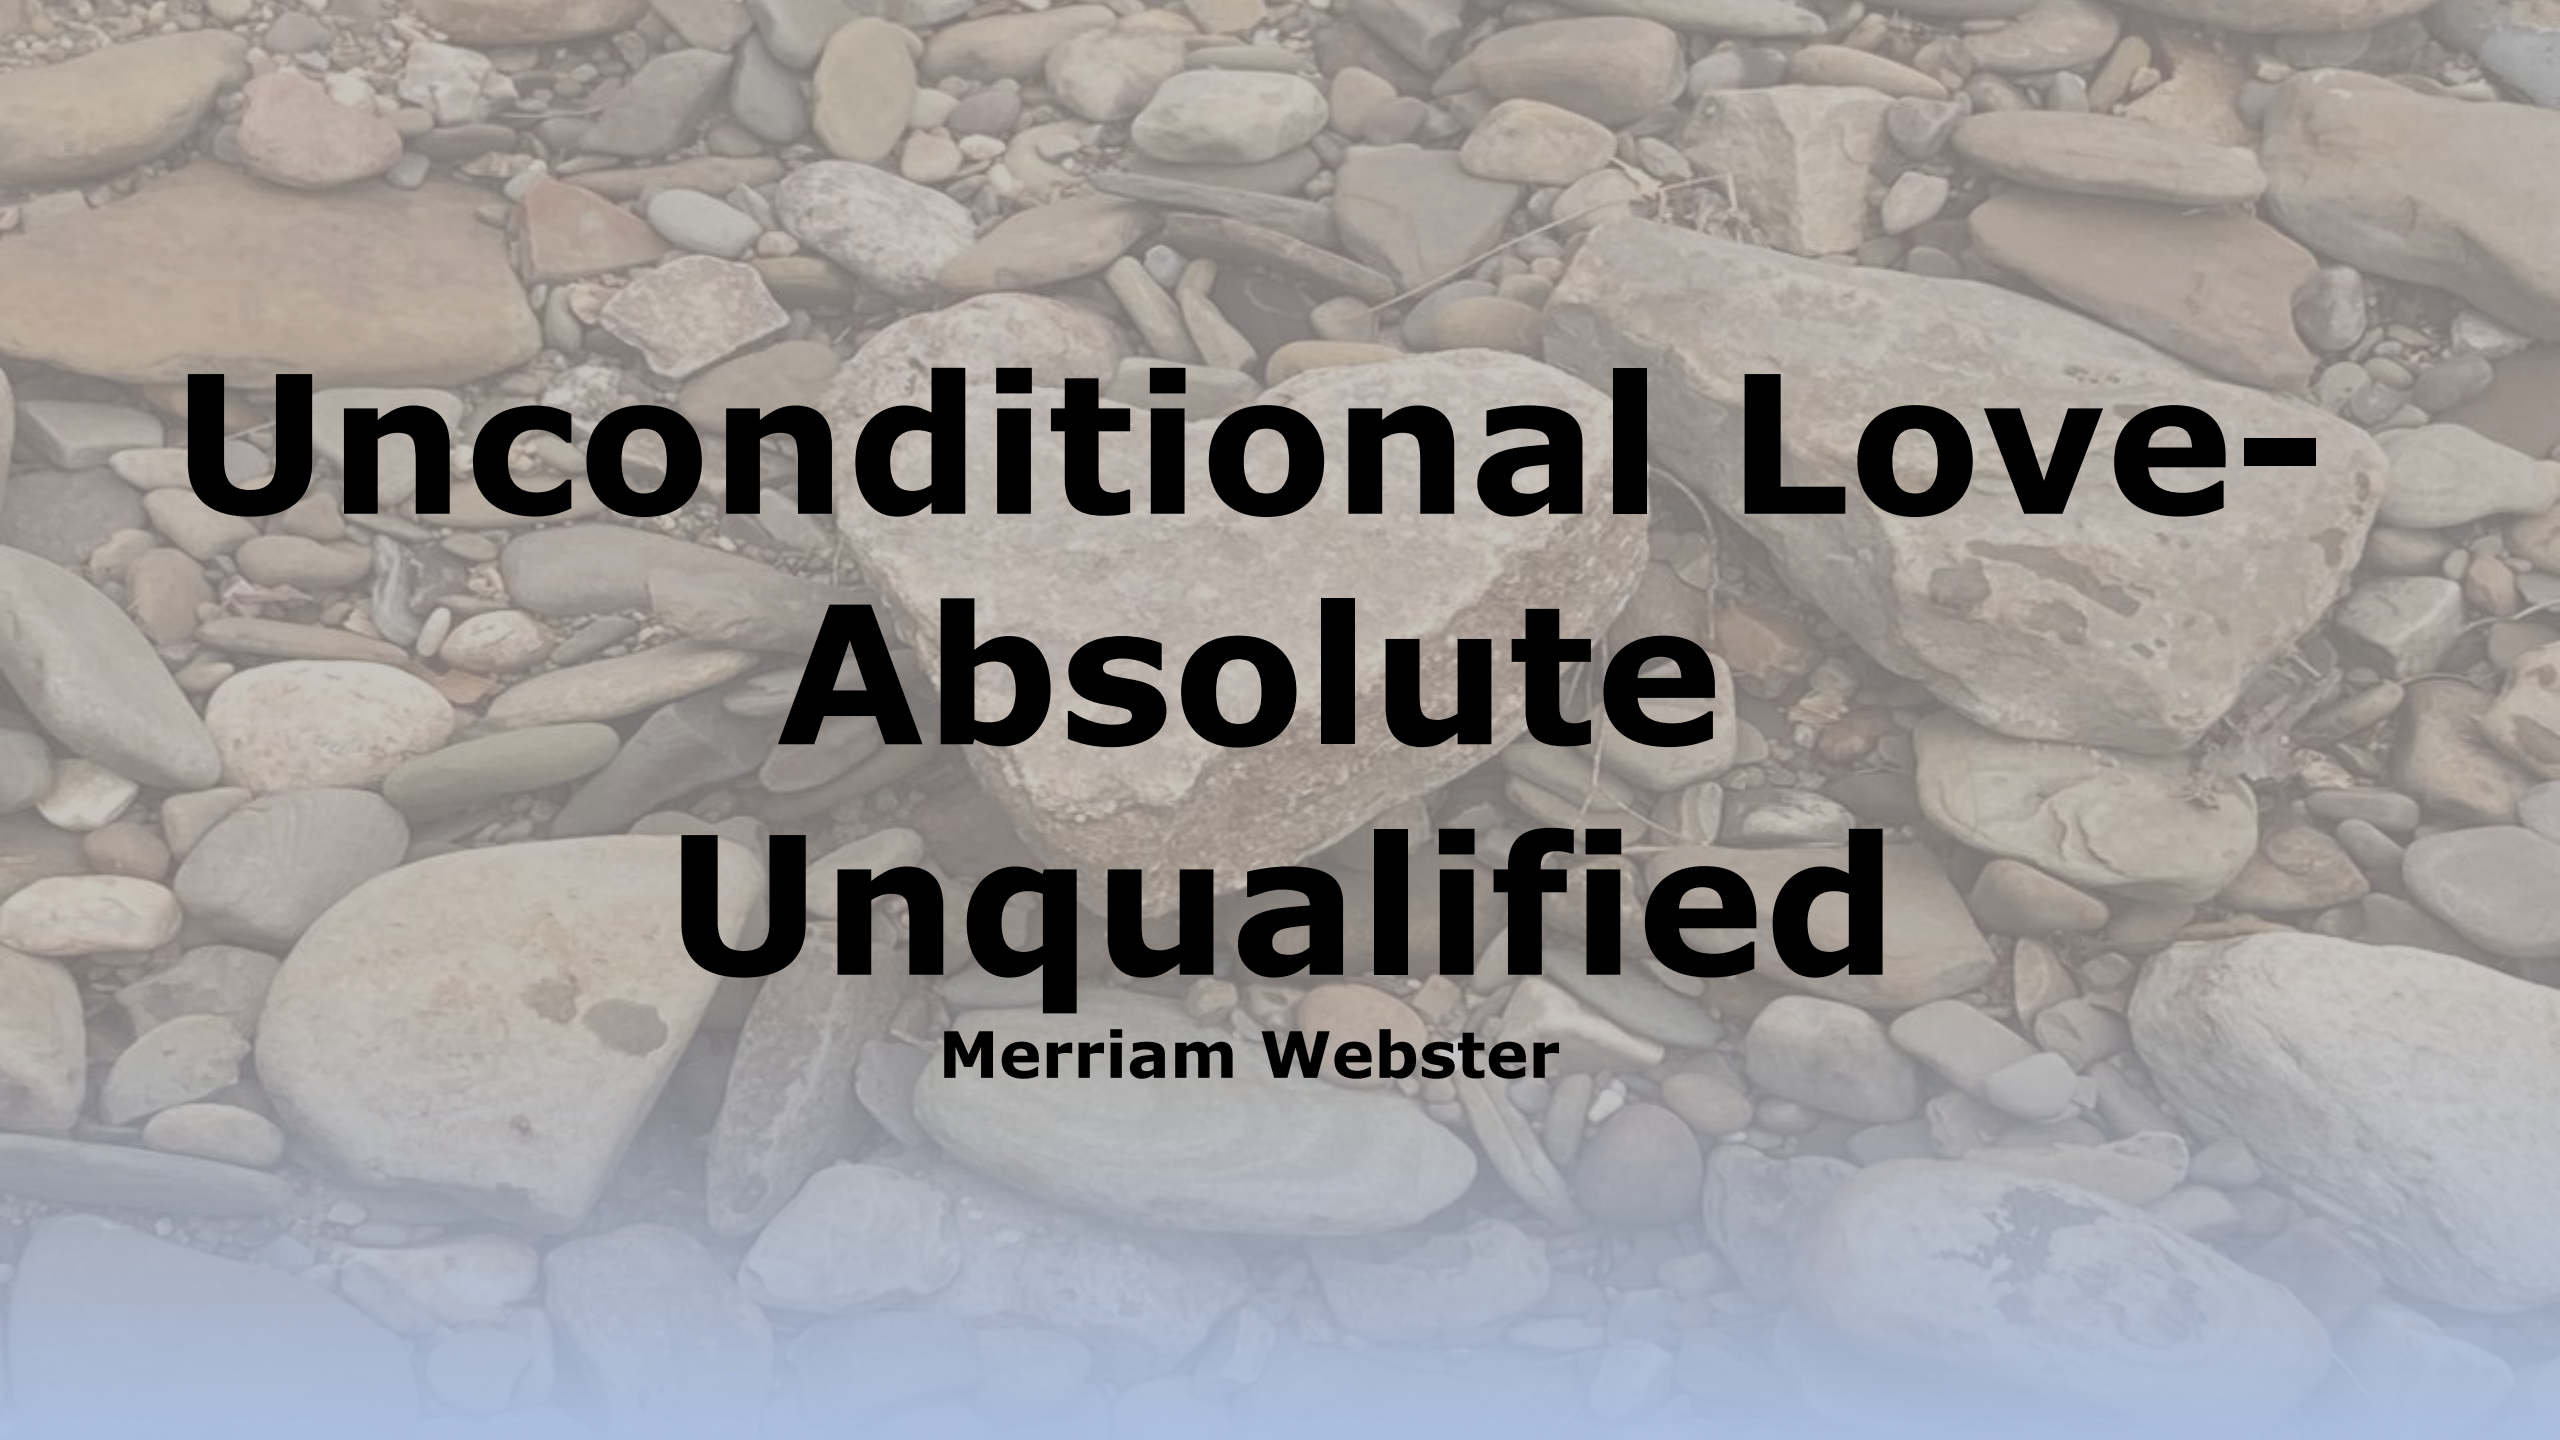

Do you cringe when you discover you are in the company of someone different than you?

Is your correct position more important than loving the person with an “incorrect” position?

“The love we employ is natural and centered more on self than upon God, geared more towards personal fulfillment than the extension of God’s Kingdom, and tends to decline when not received, rewarded or acknowledged. In this respect we are much like the world in our practices and lifestyles. That is those who have a sense of morality in the world.”
